WHAT IS GOOGIE?

The word "Googie" was born in Southern California and named for a West Hollywood coffee shop designed in 1949 by John Lautner, a student of Frank Lloyd Wright. Architecture critic Douglas Haskell was the first to use "Googie" to describe the architectural movement, after driving to the West Hollywood coffee shop and finally feeling like he had found a name for the style that was flourishing in the postwar era". (Smithsonian.com, 2012)

"Googie is a modern (ultramodern, even) architectural style that helps us understand post-WW11 American futurism -- an era thought of as a "golden age" of futurist design for many here in the present. It's a style built on exaggeration; on dramatic angles; on plastic and steel and neon and wide-eyed technological optimism. It draws inspiration from Space Age ideals and rocket ship dreams. We find Googie at the 1964 New York World's Fair, the Space Needle in Seattle, the mid-century design of Disneyland's Tomorrowland, in Arthur Radebaugh's postwar illustrations, and in countless coffee shops and motels across the U.S.

City records show that our present location, here on Del Monte Avenue, opened as "Harry's Diner" in 1964 and Del Monte Avenue served as Highway One... So when "Googie Grill" was renovated in 2014, there was a conscious decision to maintain the original Googie design, extending the seating area yet keeping the "look of tomorrow" of the 1950's and 1960's.
